“Everyone knows” what the future of US healthcare looks like. We’re moving from volume to value, from fee for service to capitated payment, from treatment to prevention, that most care will be rendered by integrated delivery networks and that physician and hospital care will be “disrupted” by new technologies that render much of what they do today unnecessary.

This talk asks the provocative question: what if these things don’t actually happen? What difference would it make for what clinicians do and how hospitals and their workforce support them? What are the most effective policies for achieving a healthier society?

Jeff Goldsmith will talk about the future of healthcare payment and care system reform and what the shape of the post-health reform landscape will look like.

Following the talk, we will hear responses from a panel of four faculty members from medicine, policy, and law.
